The Four Rs For Evaluating Motorcycle Riding Risk

1. The Rider (that's You): Are you physically and mentally prepared to ride safely? Here are some of the most important considerations:

Physically Fit. Physical impairments, like injuries or lack of sleep, will compromise alertness and safety.

Emotionally Fit. Riders should not be preoccupied with emotional distractions.

Chemically Unimpaired. It goes without saying that motorcycle riding and consumption of controlled substances is often a lethal combination.

Wearing Proper Gear. Because the risks of motorcycling can be mitigated—but not eliminated—it's imperative that riders wear all their protective gear all the time.

Have the Right Attitude. Riders should display a proper attitude, enjoying the ride, but doing so responsibly. Wheelies, stoppies, riding with legs draped over the handlebars, excessive speed, or other high-risk behaviors, inevitably, will lead to a rider going down and endangering themselves and others.

2. Your Ride

Bike Mechanically Fit. Like the pilot who does a walk around of a plane before takeoff, riders should make sure their bike is ready to ride: properly inflated tires, turn signals and brake lights working, no obvious mechanical issues, etc.

Familiar Bike. When I ride an unfamiliar bike, it usually takes me at least 30 minutes of riding before I feel "dialed in" and fully in control of the new motorcycle. It's important to take it easy and not push any limits until your confidence level is at 100 percent.

Visible to Others. Are you riding a blacked-out bike (without reflectors or auxiliary lights) in black leathers, wearing a graphite color helmet at night? One of the leading causes of accidents is other motorists not seeing the motorcyclist. Be visible!

Hauling Cargo. If you are hauling human or other cargo, the bike will handle differently: directional changes will be slower, braking distances will increase, and acceleration will be degraded. A slower responding bike requires adjustments to speed, following distances, and other similar riding considerations.

4. Your Riding Environment

Time of Day. Riding into the sun, either in early morning or late evening, can severely limit a rider's ability to see where he or she is going and avoid hazards. I usually try not to ride at night, because my ability to see and be seen is greatly compromised. It's also at these times of day that deer and certain other members of the animal kingdom are most active, further increasing risk.

Weather. Fog, rain, snow, freezing temperatures, extreme heat, thunderstorms, and other types of severe weather pose a much greater threat to a motorcyclist's ability to avoid hazards and be visible to other motorists, not to mention the danger of being injured or killed by the severe weather itself.

Traffic Congestion. With drivers talking on cell phones, texting, trying to read while driving, and the myriads of other distractions available today, the heightened exposure of riding in heavy traffic is pretty obvious. Because many of those other drivers may not be alert to your presence, riders must be extra alert to the rapid-fire succession of threats developing around them.

Bottom line: Riders should continuously assess their riding perils, both before and during the ride, so they can mitigate them. Sometimes, when the threat level is just too high, the best mitigation may be to just not ride.

Watching the Leaves Instead of the Road?

There is no doubt many of the best riding days are in autumn, especially in the New England states. Celebration of the fall foliage season is a long-standing tradition here in New Hampshire, complete with online foliage maps and guides to the best locations to experience the normally-slow transition of trees from green to bare.

By then, all the major rallies (Daytona Bike Week, Myrtle Beach Bike Week Spring Rally, Laconia Motorcycle Week, and Sturgis Motorcycle Rally) are in your rearview mirror and the road ahead becomes, at least for a brief period if nature cooperates, the most comfortable and beautiful season to be piloting two- or three-wheeled vehicles. Cool mornings and comfortable temperatures throughout the day, beautiful scenery, and an abundance of destinations offer the perfect excuse to skip a day or two of work or take a long weekend ride.

Despite all that calls to you to hit the road, fall foliage season can also be a threat to your safety. How? Well, let's take a look, starting with you and working outward.

Perhaps your riding season has been shortened by weather, work, or other responsibilities. You're eager to get out and get away. That's understandable, but do you adequately prepare before heading out? Sure, you may have an idea where you're heading (maybe not), but have you checked all the boxes for a good ride? Is your bike ready? Are you ready? If riding with a passenger, are they ready? What's the weather forecast? Any road closure or construction areas where you're planning to ride? The list goes on, but let's try to hit a few important ones.

If you're an experienced rider, you already know how to prepare for departure. If you're new to fall foliage riding, start by realizing that you won't be the only one out there enjoying the scenery. There is no scientific evidence that already bad drivers become horrible drivers in the fall, but lots of riders claim the changing leaves cast a spell over "challenged" vehicle operators.

Ever get stuck driving on a two-lane road behind an enormous motorhome (usually with out-of-state plates)? Well, prepare for a rough ride if the AMD (amateur motorhome driver) is spending more time consuming the scenery than the roadway ahead. Is the wheeled-whale in front of you weaving side-to-side in the lane? Yep, strike one. Is it moving well under the posted speed limit, slowing you and following traffic to a crawl? Of course, it is – strike two. And you're eager to pass this house-on-wheels before the sun sets? Well, that could be strike three for you.

Riding behind a billboard-sized obstruction puts you at a serious disadvantage. You can't see around it. You can't see the road surface ahead to know if there are threats that the behemoth can safely drive over or through but you can't. And perhaps equally serious, other roadway users can't see you. What to do?

Short of a quick downshift and a handful of throttle in a safe passing area, it's best to back off and create space between you and Moby Dick. You already know very few people signal their intentions, so don't count on the driver alerting you that they're turning left or right to get a better view of the trees. And don't let traffic behind you tailgate your ride; you need more time and distance to react to roadway hazards when your view ahead is limited, not less.

So you safely pass the whale, now what? Prepare for unsignaled lane merging by vehicles in the breakdown lane. A vehicle loaded with noisy kids and tired adults has "DANGER, Will Robinson" written all over it. Keep left to create space, watch for front wheel movement, and prepare for the next encounter.

As the foliage season progresses, prepare for another hazard – leaves on the roadway. Not all New Hampshire roads are smooth, debris-free highways of enjoyment. Dry leaves can be dangerous, but wet leaves in a curve can create pucker moments (or more) in the saddle. Once again, look ahead.

The sheer volume of other roadway users (including bicyclists and pedestrians) trying to enjoy the scenery just like you creates more issues on narrow, twisting, sight-ahead limited two-lane roads. Campers, hikers, picnic-basket-toting families, and those unfamiliar with our scenic pull-offs and parks, tend to focus on their own enjoyment of nature, not yours. And then there is the issue of unleashed pets and natures' own creatures to add to your list of possible ride-ruiners. An untethered dog in the road, or even on the edge of the roadway, may force you into an evasive maneuver that pushes you across the center line and into danger's path.

Finally, there are a few in our own community that treat fall foliage rides as racetrack events. Their plan is to get from point A to point B in the shortest time possible. That's not the definition of a scenic ride or a safe one on public roadways. We've seen enough of this behavior to know that it only takes one rider to ruin the ride, the road, and the season for others. Don't fall into the trap of equating a public road with a private racetrack. Don't encourage or condone it in others. You become an experienced motorcyclist by learning from past mistakes, and sharing what you know with others. There is a time and a place for everything, and racing or stunting on public roads isn't it.

So, has all of this possible doom and gloom convinced you to leave the bike at home and hop on to a diesel-powered tour bus? Let's hope not, as trading the open experience of sun, wind, and beauty under your control for the safety of a 22-ton Greyhound-sized bus is not how fall foliage was meant to be enjoyed.

Before heading out, make your own list. Where to go, what to take, whom to ride with. Include provisions for "Plan B" options, such as a cell phone and a first-aid kit. Know the other riders if you're heading out in a group. Keep our Ride S.M.A.R.T. principles in mind, especially the "Aware" component, for these fall foliage rides. And just enjoy yourself; our riding season is too short to allow great riding days to slip by.
